Who Is Responsible for It?

a rescue establishment right here," and by "right here" Captain Madison meant within the city limits, quite apparently.

"Even then," said the reporter, "do you believe in herding several hundred women in one den, like a lot of horses or sows, in on place, like they are at Twelfth?"

"I would say, off hand, that we would prefer to have vice confined like that rather than have them distributed all over our streets."

"Even if the profits of such herding were to accrue to a few persons?" was asked.

"Well, I am not in position to say," was the answer.

"But, supposing that such a herding of human beings was done by order and consent of the police authorities; not only that, but that the police absolutely ordered such sequestration of women; that they compelled them to live there for the behoof and private profit of certain private persons, presumably the police department, would you approve of that?"

"No," responded the captain. "We do not believe in licensing crime of any sort, as we view it—against liquor, tobacco or any other evil."

Blot on the Community.

The real leader of the Penol Mission was working elsewhere than at headquarters last evening. A female member of the mission said that she knew nothing about the matter, but in answer to further inquiries she added that she thought that local conditions here were far from satisfactory. "But," she said, "I would refer you to M. C. Goodman for further information as to the views of this mission on that question."

When Mr. Goodman was seen later on he was asked:

"What do you know of it?"

"Nothing," he answered.

"Have you been there?" was asked.

"Yes," he answered.

"What do you think of it?"

"I do not care to say; I was one of the boys once. Through a Christian now, I was once with the gang."

"Well, what do you have to say on the matter?" asked the reporter.

"I think it should be abolished," he said, seriously, yet promptly. "It is a stigma on the community."
